The biggest change of the year is that the referee switches to a 40-second play clock after the ball dies, rather than 25 seconds after he is ready to play. It matches high school football with both college and professional leagues for the most part. Ideally, this change won't go unnoticed during the season - coaches get plays to suit time, teams get into formations and get snaps off. Mechanically, the ball-lowering formula raises the hand as a signal to start the play clock. Other signals that notify you of an incomplete path, stop the clock if it goes down first, or end play also work as a start to the play clock. The 25-second clock is used at certain times after a timeout (team or official) after enforcing penalties, injuries and other management situations. If for some reason the ball is not found by the time the clock falls to 25 seconds (deep incomplete pass, equipment problem, etc.), the clock must be reset to 25 when the ball is finally found. Remember, different from the upper levels, there is no display of the play clock on the field, so coaches and teams need to know if it is set to 25 or 40 and develop the rest of the feel. Officials signal when there is 10 or 5 seconds left, depending on the mechanics, but generally there is no way to know exactly how much time is left. Everyone will get used to the new system, so expect some extra timeouts to be used early in the season. Previously, we were able to set the pace of the game by adjusting the time between the end of play and when the whistle was ready. Preparation can be slightly delayed for the team from a game where they are struggling to get a minor injury or play. Unfortunately, the delays for each umpire were some degree different, which also caused inconsistencies. This is also becoming a factor if teams want to execute their plays as fast as possible, but those involved need to keep the pace of both teams the same. The referee can't wait to blow the whistle for the slow team after 10 seconds of the dead ball, but immediately blows in for a team that wants to run fast in the same game. At the 40-second clock, the total time is the same, but the team can perform the play as soon as it is ready. It wasn't has nothing to do with changes in safety rules, and helmet contact for the first time in years, a good sign that things are improving in that area. The first change is to adjust to the rules of the horse's collar. Before this year, tacklers actually had to grab a ball carrier inside a shoulder pad or jersey opening to commit a foul. Now, the horse collar rule includes efforts in the nameplate area. A good change because runners are still at risk of foot injuries when they pull back either way. The second safety rule is that it is illegal to stumble over runners. This is another alignment with the higher levels of football and the movement towards using consistent tackling techniques to down the ball carrier. I think the risk of injury is obvious when runners run at full speed and opponents kick and hit their legs. In addition to some changes on jersey issues, the only other changes deal with legal offensive formations. Last year, offensive teams needed to put seven players on the line because they don't get an advantage. Unfair Law The trial judge shall enforce any penalties he considers fair, including the awarding of scores. The signal of the hand to pay attention is made by the referee. Their signals will help you understand just what happened on the scene. Maybe the player grabbed another player's face mask and was penalized. Maybe the coach is called a timeout. Maybe someone scored. All of these actions, and dozens of others, have corresponding hand signals to tell fans and timekeepers. You can see different types of signals grouped by similarities: retaining hand offsides or illegal use or intrusive fake initiation roughing up passers-by with personal foul play from attacks
